Lobular and ductular carcinoma in situ of the breast diagnosed on fine needle aspiration biopsy: a report of seven cases and review of the literature. Lobular carcinoma in situ (LCIS) and ductal carcinoma in situ (DCIS) are lesions of the breast, which have been reported in women of all ages. While LCIS can be clinically detected as a circumscribed mass, DCIS appears as a spectrum of architectural patterns encompassing comedonecrosis, papillary, solid, cribriform and micropapillary forms. Malignant papillary lesions may mimic a papilloma. A few cytologic cases of LCIS have been reported in the literature. In this study, we examined seven cases of LCIS or DCIS, diagnosed on aspiration smears in female patients, with the following cytologic findings: (i) hyperchromatic nuclei with coarse chromatin and small clumps of nuclear material in the cytoplasm, (ii) loss of polarity or cellular cohesion, (iii) increased nuclear-cytoplasmic ratio of greater than 1.0 and (iv) glassy or optically empty appearance. In the immunocytochemical staining of the seven cases, S-100 protein showed strong positive staining of the epithelial cells, and cytokeratin (CK) 7 was positive in four cases, CK 19 in four cases, and calretinin in four cases, which suggested they were not of a mucinous or myoepithelial nature. This study suggests that cytomorphologic features of LCIS and DCIS should be highlighted to recognize these lesions in cytologic smears.

Are we in the Age of Populism? Donald Trump's success will do nothing to stop populism, it's just the latest sign of the death of liberal democracy. It was perhaps inevitable that Donald Trump, who came into the presidency as an outsider to the powers that be, would become the most powerful leader in American history. And that in itself could just be the beginning. The great surprise of Trump's presidency, and the reason why he has perhaps more supporters than Clinton did back in November, is that we have never seen anything like it before. The man who seems to be calling for the abolition of political correctness, the man who embraced Vladimir Putin's praises for him being "a leader for a new world", the man whose supporters appear Catabolic processes in effusion-associated conditions. Because of the high incidence of thoracic or pleural effusion of unknown origin (PUE) in geriatric patients and because thoracentesis is a common procedure, it is important to determine whether or not the geriatric patient's catabolic processes are altered as a result of the procedure. Therefore, leukocyte esterase activity was measured by an enzyme assay in the supernatant of pleural fluid samples. Leukocyte counts in pleural fluid were lower in geriatric than in pediatric patients. Leukocyte esterase levels were elevated in geriatric patients with malignant effusion, but not in patients with other etiologies of pleural effusion. These findings suggest that a disturbance in the catabolic processes of geriatric patients may be related to the clinical condition associated with pleural effusion. It is well known to provide an inlet tube for gas chromatography, chromatograph mass spectroscopy, or other applications. The inlet tube performs several functions. A first function is to provide an inlet to a gas chromatograph. Gas chromatograph inlet tubes are manufactured in lengths of about 3 m and are connected through a union to a manifold. The manifold receives sample material from a sampling device and transfers it to the inlet tube. The inlet tube further serves to hold the sample material to ensure proper transfer. The inlet tube also interfaces the sample stream with the internal inlet of the gas chromatograph, commonly referred to as the primary column. In addition to the interface, the inlet tube performs the function of removing the sample gas from the surface of the sample and transferring it into the main gas stream so that it is exposed to the primary column. Unfortunately, the inlet tube does not always transfer the sample fluid away from the inlet to the gas chromatograph with minimum dilution. Since gas chromatography is a quantitative analytical method, there are numerous cases where the goal of a sample analysis is to obtain a close and accurate representation of the amount of fluid transferred from the inlet tube to the main column, especially in the final elution of a gas chromatography chromatogram. The amount of dilution is usually characterized by a low percent error (e.g.
