The aim of this study was to assess the predictive value of the TEG platelet aggregation method in the detection of platelet activation. One-hundred-fifty-two platelet-rich plasma and 22 autologous platelet concentrates were evaluated. The aggregates of 62 platelet concentrates and 5 platelet-rich plasmas were classified as strong aggregates (SAs). The remaining 89 platelet concentrates were grouped as weak aggregates (WAs). All platelet concentrates with SAs were obtained from a buffy-coat prepared from blood with high hematocrit (> or = 0.80) and were treated with standard addition of calcium chloride (0.4 mmol/L). Every 10 samples of WA and each sample with SAs were evaluated with the TEG aggregation method and by flow cytometry. SAs were correlated to the lower platelet count (P =.01), lower pH values (P =.03), and higher pCO(2) values (P =.03). There was no correlation with pH and pCO(2) on a platelet count basis. All samples with SAs demonstrated either decreased pH (P =.001), lower platelet count (P =.001), or higher pCO(2) (P =.003) values. After 10 minutes of storage, samples with SAs displayed higher pH (P =.001) and a lower platelet count (P =.03
