Stranded far from the protection of the indifferent night, the ragged cleric regarded his surroundings with a mixture of curiosity and panic. At one time he had been happy to lounge amidst the greenish glow of the mosses in the forest, absorbing what he could about God and the forces he represented from the copious volumes of the codex. What was this god who wanted him dead? Myстера wanted to know more about this. A floral scent led the way. The scent was stronger and certainly more pleasant than muck. He followed it and found himself in a green world, with strange plants and flowers that were merely the fantasy of a mad mind. The tentacle-like branches creaked under his weight when he stepped on them. He was glad of the daylight. It helped him understand the abundant shapes of the flora, which reminded him of his own history book, but without the tales. Without the story there was no point in his life, and he no longer needed it. He was shocked by the limitless places he had been, the knowledge he had gained, and the places he had dreamed of. He was on the magical world's surface, but it was unconcealed in the light. Long moments passed before he stopped to rest. He sat on the ground and noticed that he wore robes of light, much like his own. It made him wonder what he might look like on the inside? The press of undergrowth stopped up his approach to the tentacle-like plant whose scent he had been following. Curious, he pulled at it, and it came away with a limp attempt at resistance. The hair coiled on his back responded to the tug. He brushed it out as best he could. His attempts at grooming when he was idle amused him. He wondered how hard it would be to get the undergrowth to grow where he lay. It seemed as good an idea as any, so it was time to be bold. Between the trunk and the broad branches around it stretched gaps and it was easy to climb over. Outside, the sun was out now and it cast pleasant shadows. He decided to walk about, as the pillars reminded him of vines. He waved his fingertips over the stubby leaves for luck, and continued. Dark-robed figures seemed to float through the branches. They bore long knives and sharp words. As he went closer to the nearest,
