This paper describes an operational strategy for using material reuse to improve the carbon dioxide emissions trading scheme. By improving the utilisation of returned waste, a shift to higher product abatement costs can be avoided. The paper uses the jipmber methodology to identify (1) how material reuse could be used to increase the organic fraction of waste, (2) how better utilisation of the already recycled organics may be used to improve the carbon accounting of the scheme, and (3) how a strategy for material reuse in the electricity sector could be developed to achieve this objective. The paper concludes with some broad recommendations for research and policy that will be most useful in tackling the issues of the carbon trading scheme. 1.
