"This is the first iteration of HyperMotion Technology, and we've made significant progress since the first iteration of Player Impact Engine," said Matt Prior, FIFA Technical Director. "The challenges were how to use a high-speed camera to create a high-quality game experience for players to interact with and the data analysis process needed to extract the data to drive the game. With the vast amount of data collected from real players we need to be able to mine it for the game specific rules, physics, gameplay and behaviors." "Using high-speed cameras, we collect motion capture data while players are actually playing live on the pitch," said Brian Brown, Chief Technology Officer at PIVOT Sports. "With this data, we use a custom algorithm, the FIFA 21 Player Impact Engine, to model the real-life player movements, the physical attributes of the player and their movements." The improved physics engine represents "game-style" physics that better represent all of the relevant actions, including player-versus-player contact and ball rolling, while providing a precise recreation of the real-life movement, on-ball actions, and the increased player speed and predictability in plays. And to ensure even more accuracy, match conditions, such as weather, wind, snow, and lighting were also taken into account in the development of the physics system. "We have to be very careful that the rules of the game are kept in check," said Geoff Freeman, Senior Producer at EA Sports. "That meant that some aspects of the game had to be simplified. Due to the lack of space in the physical simulation, we had to limit the number of sub-physics such as physics of the ball, collisions of players with each other and, when possible, the ball. While enabling the new engine, FIFA 21 improves the physics engine in other ways to improve the feeling of player movement and all of the physical actions like the new elasticity of player collision and physical characteristics of players that give a higher degree of realism. The significant advances of the Player Impact Engine, in part due to the availability of real-life training data and analytics, help us model more accurately real-life play, ball-interaction and the reactions and movements of players. With the use of this data, the engine is used in four different ways. For Player Behavior and Player Personalities
