What's new:

Overview: Final departure My final return flight was on Aerofly FS 2. Whilst this was a return flight the company has downgraded the aircraft to using check-in, at a desk, on the ground as the only check-in method. This was a problem on this flight as I needed to check-in the next day for my flight leaving on the same day, hence why the issue with the check-in desk got me back to the UK early. The check-in was the last checkpoint for passport control on this flight as she was checking in people from Germany. There was no Mobile Passport check either. This also meant that I had five passports to check in and a luggage alert to be dealt with. The check-in desk had very little resources besides the check-in table and a pen on a plastic chair. The check-in table had a computer connected to a screen but it didn't appear to have the anti-theft software in-placed on the computer and it didn't appear that the computer had a USB port to connect to an external scanning device. At the desk I was first sent to a desk located behind the check-in table. When taking my bag to the desk to scan my boarding pass the bag was secured to a base with a chain and had a strap attached to a bracket sticking out from the bottom of the bag. My bag didn't have a strap and my new carry-on bag had no bracket. On top of the desk was a cart with some headsets which a staff member could use if busy. There were a few headsets, one for the headset and several for cellphones and MyPhone flight jackets. There were two staff in front of the desk, one was in fact the check-in agent that checked me in and the other was a "service" desk agent. The service desk agent turned out to be a manager that had been sent to the check-in desk with instructions to "help". The agent that checked me in, despite being busy was polite and polite although somewhat disorganised. She had to send requests through because she had forgotten her password and didn't have access to a work mobile. The check-in agent assisted. Sometimes the kiosk was open, sometimes the kiosk was closed. It meant that some passengers were kept waiting and were not given instructions of where to go for security. I was told to take a seat at the table behind the check
