Note, this may be larger than the true FDR (i.e., the FDR of the data set at hand that would be empirically estimated, as opposed to the FDR of the simulation). This ensures that we find the false positives that are actually used for power analysis. FDR = 0.0 was used for the independent test scenario, but the analysis is the same under any other FDR setting. Each of the analyses described above were run for different simulated values of K, as well as the observed K. Each simulation had K levels from 7 to 60, and each level was replicated 20 times. For each level of K, we generated the null hypothesis using 4 different sample sizes (N=5,7,10,20), and varied the number of true signals (S) from 5 to 9. Under each of the settings in Section 3.1, we calculated the FDR, FP and FN for each of the levels of K, as well as the FDR, FP and FN for each of the sample sizes. We repeated this process for the each of the 4 scenarios. In Fig 2, we display the results for the setting when S=8 and N=10. In Fig 3, b7e8fdf5c8
