CoreX is a.Viral infections on the horizon of work-related musculoskeletal disorders. Many viral infections are potentially work-related and health care workers exposed to bloodborne viruses have a higher risk of developing occupation-related illnesses. In areas of the body most frequently affected by work-related musculoskeletal disorders, such as the neck and shoulders, some viral infections are responsible for the disease. According to some recent studies, a high prevalence of hepatitis B virus and human immunodeficiency virus infections (HIV) has been reported among physicians and nurses. Even though the majority of studies show evidence that work-related occupational musculoskeletal disorders are not associated with viral infections, research is urgently needed to investigate better and more efficient methods to diagnose occupational viral infections, especially in the case of bloodborne viruses that are potentially more dangerous for health care workers., Mellema, and de Vries, [B41])---*~1~ from f1 to f7, and ~2~ from f8 to f16. The second model (~20~) is tested with a common decay and a common activation, *~c~, from f1 to f10 (posterior probability was 0.88). (E) Transformed area-under-curve (tAUC) and tAUC 95% confidence intervals for classifier predictions (paired tests, bootstrapped with 10,000 samples). *~10~ shows improved predictive ability relative to *~20~.](fnhum-07-00597-g0001){#F1} As expected, this shows a clear differentiation between the two groups of patients with one of them being more impaired (>95% of *~10~). However, these models did not discriminate well between the groups of patients in the resting sessions. Because there are multiple afferents and multiple efferents, the high degree of connectivity at rest is expected to be quite similar in both groups. The observed differences at rest suggest that additional brain activations occur only when working memory tasks are performed. This interpretation is supported by the results of the permutation 0cc13bf012
