That final door was a great twist. The timing of that was challenging, but he pulled it off. It's always exciting to not have the same floor or pathway you used previously. That's a good idea for the next round. It's going to be hard to beat. I liked how it was a puzzle game, but once I got past the puzzles I was able to just explore and discover. At the end of the day, it's still about the same old formula: pick a path to your destination, but now with more twists. I think the guy who created the character of the rabbit, "Bunny", should have some sort of trouble soon. He's super cute! You get to make your own journey with different paths, but you can never use the same route twice. "Pode" Originality: I'm thankful I had the same dream as the rabbit. I got to go through his entire journey, and it was extremely charming. I'm glad to see how much this game reminds me of Temple Run. It's a fun, engaging, puzzle, runner game! I would recommend this game to people who are looking for something to do while they're chilling out or for those of you who just enjoy fun puzzles. I don't want to say anything negative about this game, but I think people who try this out will get a perfect 10/10 score.Q: How to allocate memory in a specific region I have the following C++ classes and implementation (win7, msvc 11.0) class base { public: base() { for (int i = 0; i m_MyArray; }; class manager { public: base m_BaseObject; std::vector* GetArray() { return &m_BaseObject.m_MyArray; }; }; When I run the program, it crashes with the following error: Exception thrown at 0x00000000 in MyApp.exe: 0x
