According to a recent article by Freelancers Union, "As unemployment rises, more employers are looking to hire freelancers instead of conventional employees." Freelancers Union notes that the unemployment rate in the U.S. is a record low at 4.4 percent. That's below the 8.2 percent level in 2007. The good news is that freelance workers are typically self-employed and they can choose their jobs and clients, according to "How Will the New Economy Impact You?" from the President's Council on Jobs and Competitiveness. The Obama Administration is on target for creating millions of new jobs for the U.S. economy by 2020. This will help businesses across the nation. However, the lingering effects of the recession have created the need for rehiring freelance workers to plug in missing staff. The biggest issue is the confidence of the people. Even though the unemployment rate is lower than it has been since President Obama took office, these numbers don't reflect the mental or emotional state of most Americans. On average, people are not as optimistic about their future as they were last year. According to a Pew Research Center report, in a poll conducted in June 2012, only 37 percent of those polled were very satisfied with their personal finances. This is the lowest satisfaction rating in about 20 years, but there is even more doubt about whether the economy will improve. A recent Bloomberg report found that investors are concerned that the housing market will continue to weaken. On top of the national numbers, many small businesses are not doing so well. According to a recent report by the U.S. Small Business Administration, more than half of small business owners plan to start hiring as a result of the unemployment rate. Freelance e79caf774b
