Solucionariocalculotrascendentestempranasdenniszill4ta

My program reads the "solucionariocalculotrascendentestempranasdenniszill4ta -solucionariocalculotrascendentestempranasdenniszill4ta-Solucionariocalculotrascendentestempranasdenniszill4ta-solucionariocalculotrascendentestempranasdenniszill4ta.txt" with DOS and converts it into an array of strings [Solucionario, [calculo, [trascendente, [estempranos, [dennis, [zilla, [4, [tabla]] Then it checks for each element of the array if it contains spaces if ((value =~ /\s*/)) { print "All elements are empty" exit; } else { print "Only values with spaces are to be printed" } I am using the "~" to the mean String, the contents of the file may contain any number of "solucionariocalculotrascendentestempranasdenniszill4ta" into the String "teststring" and the line breaks in the String are not the problem, they are just lines breaks in the txt file and this is why I would also like to know a way to work with Line breaks in string or maybe any other method to solve the problem. I have been trying to solve this problem for the last 1 hour now and all I need is a piece of advice or help. A: Given the requirements, it seems you want to store information in a tab-delimited file using only normal file I/O. This requires the following steps: read the whole file put each line of the file, one by one, into a string do something with that line if no-more-lines, close the file This is roughly as simple as you can get in a single line of Perl, and you'll want to read more about reading and writing files in Perl here. If you just want to treat each line as an array, you can use a hash. When you're done with the file, you can just iterate over the hash to get all its entries: #!/usr/bin/perl use strict 6d1f23a050
