Heparin-induced thrombocytopenia (HIT) is a drug-induced immune-mediated thrombocytopenia, mostly occurring with unfractionated heparin. Fewer side effects and increased efficacy compared with other anticoagulant agents are the unique selling points of heparin. HIT diagnosis requires a combination of clinical and laboratory criteria: high-sensitivity platelet assays, such as the ELISA assay and the serotonin release assay, are used as their main diagnostic tools. They are supported by the platelet activation test, which is quite easy to perform. Some exceptions exist: the paradoxical heparin-induced thrombocytopenia (P-HIT) syndrome, in which a platelet activation abnormality occurs in the absence of a pathogenic autoantibody, and the heparin-dependent thrombocytopenic purpura (Heparin-DPT), which is associated with an IgG-class autoantibody against platelet glycoprotein Ib. The relationship between thrombosis and heparin-induced thrombocytopenia has not been clearly established yet. It is often considered that the risk of thrombosis is higher for HIT patients, compared with patients treated with other anticoagulants. However, specific protocols for treating patients with HIT-related thrombosis are not yet available. This article summarizes the current knowledge of the mechanisms underlying HIT and is based on the literature available in Medline.
