A new 3D printer, fabricated by researchers at Harvard University, can print multiple different types of materials in a single print run, giving life to some previously difficult to manufacture "smart materials." As a demonstration, the researchers printed an electronic circuit, neural tissue, even some liquid metal. The new printer is a smart device that relies on thermocapillary convection, a phenomenon in which a fluid in a pipe moving through hot or cold fluid converts heat energy into mechanical energy to move material through a bath or printer. "This is a new, additive approach to mass printing in a robust, versatile and straightforward manner," study co-author Aude Rebuffe, a postdoctoral fellow in Harvard's Wyss Institute for Biologically Inspired Engineering, said in a statement. "Using thermocapillary forces, we are able to control each layer of material printing, resulting in a 3D printed object that has the true potential of being the evolution of additive manufacturing." The printer, which works with a wide variety of materials, is a compact, low-cost device that can be used anywhere with a regular power outlet and can be built into mobile devices. The researchers focused their development on traditional bioprinting approaches that deliver materials one at a time, including extrusion printing, inkjet and microfluidic techniques. In comparison, their new printer architecture allows the researchers to control the deposition of each layer of a 3D structure, making it possible to completely print objects that are difficult to manufacture using traditional methods. Using thermocapillary techniques, the researchers were able to print structures such as neural tissue, microscale fluidic networks and metals. "With thermocapillary printing of neural tissue, it was possible to print neural cells encapsulated in a hydrogel and then induce their differentiation into fully mature neurons by controlling the printing and post-processing of the neurons, as well as monitoring their function by detecting the
