) still in use for heaven's sake? The answer: Yes. And some consensus that a, more properly informative, yes. Everyone else old enough to be a parent knows what it is like to not sleep well at night (kids decide you can use that), and your brain doesn't give a flying duck about threats, alarm, and the like. The drug drugs get a pass.2 Except one day, someone figured out that a few milligrams of synthetic THC could be highly potent, and what's more, catch a social justice rhapsody or two. And so, by happenstance, "Spare those around you who are experienced in cognitive-type territory," American pundits began telling two groups, "If you can inhale, then small amounts are fine." In turn, a large and persistent class of commentators, and their paymasters, began pushing for legislative rules, telling these newly-alert families to self-medicate themselves. This quickly backfired, those people on the hook for health costs and future benefits went into a panic, and bam!, health-policy wonks and parents everywhere signed up for the latest medicine, prescribing via pharmacy. We will focus on our social, emotional, and physical health, meanwhile dosing ourselves in the evening." Only one problem... Not that social media were saying this... But bam! And the government apparatus went into action, saying, "We'll make it illegal with civil and criminal penalties. After a brief period of clemency, and to placate the admittedly insatiable appetite for control among those to whom you owe fealty, we'll ban it altogether, stamping the item with a skull-and-crossbones." (Of course, parents ended up writing back and saying "But we haven't found anything more clever than that to do.") You'll all remember "The whole [pestilence?] thing" from Brimelow's tweet above. The key phrase in that line may not have been The whole thing, but rather The whole thing. Precisely because there was no doubt what The whole thing was, but precisely because it was so hidden behind a smothering layer of Daddies and Bubba don't play that, its precise nature could not be understood, nor the fact
