Human immunodeficiency virus type-1 (HIV-1) encoded proteins are increasingly recognized as important in the progression of HIV-1 infection. One of the two viral encoded enzymes, reverse transcriptase (RT) is the critical enzyme which is the target of the approved drug combination, AZT and ddI. Studies of RT in vitro, as well as in vivo data to date have suggested a two-pronged attack on this enzyme as occurring during infection. Firstly, cell-associated reverse transcriptase (CA-RT) is synthesized at high levels, and secondly, there is an increase in the amount of a cellular form of RT, named type-1 RT, which lacks the carboxyl-terminal domain (CTD) and is exclusively found in the nucleus of infected cells. This activity is termed nuclear type-1 RT (NT-1 RT). In studies we have found that the use of recombinant vaccinia virus (VV) vectors expressing macrophage (M)-tropic HIV-1 (HIV-1 Mt) RT (M-tropic RT) results in the development of a pulmonary disease resembling AIDS in humans, and that the lung, as well as other tissues, accumulate HIV-1, reverse transcribe the viral RNA and express the HIV-1 RT protein. Since the early antigenic peptides, early proteins (gp160, gp120 and gp41) of HIV-1 are also expressed in the lungs of VV-RT infected mice, a natural target cell for HIV-1 infection, our studies are aimed at defining the sequences within the HIV-1 RT that are responsible for the development of HIV-1 induced lung disease in this animal model. To achieve this we have constructed humanized, HIV-1-specific monoclonal antibodies (mAbs) which bind to conserved epitopes on the RT/DNA complex. In order to determine whether these mAbs inhibit the viral life cycle in vivo, we have prepared three different mouse strains in which the M-tropic, T-cell line HIV-1 clone (M5) is expressed in order to generate HIV-1 specific T-cell lines in the target mouse. One of the mAbs we have isolated, T20, has been well-characterized in vivo and has been shown to prevent the development of pulmonary disease in murine HIV-1 infection. In vitro, T20 inhibits the ability of M-tropic HIV-1 to infect activated lymphocytes and to cause
