As the threat of a government shutdown has faded, news of the Health and Human Services (HHS) Department's massive data breach should spur further media coverage, increased interest from government watchdogs, and demands for federal funding for a critical electronic security study. A year after the breach, which took place in late 2013, HHS officials released an unclassified report revealing the nature of the breach. According to the report, a foreign power successfully exploited a U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs (VA) medical database. The attack occurred in late December 2013. The government attributed the breach to a foreign power that, as part of a nation-state sponsored attack, successfully breached a federal database and stole medical information of more than nine million U.S. veterans, including the names, addresses, and Social Security numbers of all veterans. News of the incident was widely reported in the media for weeks. The target of the attack was the Veterans Benefits Management System (VBMS). The "exploitation" of the information took place as employees were pulling together information for weekly VA payroll. The attack, as one would expect, resulted in heavy damage to employee productivity and was not disclosed to employees until after the attack was over. In addition to the stolen data, the government report also revealed that an anonymous employee, whose job title was not provided, created a malicious link in an email and sent the link to multiple people via email. The link was likely opened by the wrong person, and the attachment they received ended up containing the malicious software. HHS discovered the compromised email just days before publicly disclosing the incident. The VBMS breach is an example of the type of security failure that has come to define the modern era of government IT. The Department of Health and Human Services may have received funding from the federal government to conduct a cybersecurity study, which would be needed to address the ongoing vulnerability of government IT systems. Unfortunately, the federal spending bill for the fiscal year 2017 only funded IT security studies for the Department of Defense (DOD) and the Department of Homeland Security (DHS), with little or no funds made available for the Department of Health and Human Services. HHS IT security is in need of major, systemic
