Gulabchand Cartoon Songs Online. Hindi Full Movie [HD]. Development of a quadruple fluorescence lifetime microscopic probe for dual or sequential analysis of Hg^{2+} and CH_3NH_3^+ in live cells. The study of mercury(II) and ammonium ions is of great importance in environmental and biological systems. A quadruple fluorescence lifetime imaging microscopic (FLIM) probe for the detection of Hg^{2+} and CH_3NH_3^+ is described. Fluorophores including diphenylmethine green (DPMG), tetraphenylboron (TPB), and phenolic blue (PB) were chosen as the emission probes for Hg^{2+} and ammonium ion detection. In the probe design, the excess of Hg^{2+} and CH_3NH_3^+ can bind with DPMG (or TPB or PB) via electron donor-acceptor (D-A) interactions, resulting in fluorescence quenching of the four probes via inner-filter effect. In addition, "turn-off" fluorescence of DPMG (or TPB or PB) was realized in the proximity of Hg^{2+} or CH_3NH_3^+ with the assistance of metal-to-ligand charge transfer (MLCT) process. To facilitate the sequential detection of Hg^{2+} and ammonium ions in live cells, the excitation/emission intervals of DPMG and TPB were selected to be 580/645 and 480/590 nm, respectively, while the excitation/emission intervals of PB and DPMG were selected to be 320/645 and 480/590 nm, respectively. The responses of DPMG (or TPB) in Hg^{2+} and CH_3NH_3^+ detection were monitored, respectively, using the probes with different excitation/emission intervals. The results exhibited that the DPMG probe (i.e., probe A)
