Abstract This paper aims to identify the influence of the socio-demographic characteristics of beneficiaries on their use of government-provided social protection benefits. A cross-sectional analysis of the 2012 South African Socio-Economic Panel (SABSE) was conducted. The study focuses on government-provided social transfers of two main kinds: housing allowances and child grants. The key dependent variable was the number of units of the SACCSA Benefits Package (SBP). A logit model was estimated which showed that, compared to white beneficiaries, black beneficiaries were less likely to use the SBP. The effect was found to be particularly strong for the housing allowance component. This paper will build an understanding of the causes of the disparity and, in doing so, contribute to the existing knowledge on poverty and inequality in the context of South Africa's unprecedented post-1994 democratic development.--- title: Remove an object reference keywords: vblr6.chm1008156 f1_keywords: - vblr6.chm1008156 ms.prod: office api_name: - Office.Remove c6a93da74d
