3dm's new reference architecture is a thing of beauty! some of the areas i'd like to improve on are the following: codify the functional operations as much as possible, add new devices and improve the existing ones and replace the limited amount of files that are compiled into one binary with the ability to compile the entire source code of the 3dm environment into a single executable. by the end of the project, we want to have a tool that takes an operating system such as linux and it's applications and creates a "virtual machine" from it that can be run on the milling machine. hence, one application is a desktop application on the host machine and a browser based application on the milling machine. this week, we attempted to get a final epoxy mold of the prototype we had built for packaging. the goal was to make sure the milling actually worked before moving forward with production. luckily for us, i have a few friends that make very high quality molds at a reasonable price. one of our friends made a heated mold and the end result looked great but the form came back deformed. sadly, the mold was not suitable for mass production. this kind of development cycle has happened before where we have a useable prototype, but this is the first time it has happened to us as a group. i spent the entire week programming as well as coding on labview. i'm sure those guys at 3dm are still rolling in the cash from this year's stress-testing. i'll probably get down to it soon and see if i can go back to a more "action oriented" project with a bit of interface design if the mood strikes me. there are two problems that i'd like to solve with this project, both of which have to do with the milling machine.
