reply to ross smry: i lived in the barracks on base. we had about 100 people living there, and about 20 people in the general population. my wife and i had a good relationship with the military there. they loved to party and always had a good time. we did the base beer run quite often. we would get a jeep and drive out to the main gate and get the beer, but we would not go all the way through the gate to the main post. we would stop and drop the beer off at the gate and go back and pick it up when we got back to the base. the guards would never stop us, but we would get a few looks from the drivers and cab drivers. my wife and i did not get married until 1974, and it was a very rough time. i never had a steady job, but i found a job with the army, and i retired in 1993. i was a medic at the 24th evac hospital (long binh) from june 66 to july 67. prior to the arrival of the us army, the area had been called long binh junction which referred to the junction of highway 1 (from saigon) and highway 15 (from bien hoa.) once the long binh stockade went up in mid-67, it was quickly given the nickname long binh jail, or lbj for short. so the term lbj had two different origins one referring to the junction of two highways and the other referring to the prisoner stockade. when we arrived, there was practically nothing there just a gigantic field that had been cleared of rubber trees and bulldozed into what looked like the worlds largest parking lot. for the first several months we built our hospital while pulling bunker guard every second or third night. in addition to being a hospital medic, i performed many other duties such as jeep driver, prisoner guard, sign painter, translator and hq clerk. also got to see/meet many celebrities who visited the 24th evac after the hospital became operational. these included nancy sinatra, james garner, henry fonda, martha raye, robert mitchum, chuck connors and mike wallace, among others. i recently wrote a humorous book about these experiences (long daze at long binh) which you can find on google. my best to all long binh vets who are still kickin!
