earlier, we discussed how peer to peer distribution is a "dinner party effect" in that it encourages selective exposure to others within similar social circles. tastes are in many ways culturally relative. if two people share a native language, then language will be a shared cultural value that would encourage similar customs, tastes, and hobbies. if two people speak different languages, then communication is more difficult, and the two people would tend to develop different habits and preferences. if two people share the same social group (e.g., race, age, gender, etc.), then they might have similar eating habits, sports preferences, work experiences, etc. this proximity will further encourage similar tastes and habits. the whiteness of the rap industry has been so taken for granted, and so normalized, that music-related articles rarely call out by name the industrys corrosive impact on black artists and audiences alike, and the artists and audiences themselves. often, artists of color feel reluctant to speak out in part because of their white audience and in part because they want a larger following. the industrys white monopoly on rap and r&b stifles both the black artists and the audiences, providing a tainted record and broken record in the process. in fact, it is difficult to think of any other american art form that operates within the same stark economic and political boundaries. a film academy president recently argued that because black lives don't matter in hollywood, black films should be blacklisted. however, some of the most important music genres, such as "jazz" and "blues," were created by or for african americans. the earliest known example of a jazz song is a recorded version of duke ellington's 1935 composition, "breezin'." free download movie downloading in minutes in the lead-up to tomorrow night's premiere of stranger things 2, evanescence is previewing a "special performance" on the eve of the new season. it's a new song that sounds like it might be part of a soundtrack, or perhaps a standalone single. the new track is super short, though, at just 200+ bpm, and does not have a real chorus. oberholtzer, rafael alves, and valeria di collu (2012) found that only 24% of latin@s with diabetes mellitus engaged in physical activity, compared to 53% of white patients with diabetes mellitus. in their study, african americans with diabetes had a statistically higher likelihood of participating in both aerobic and strength activities (68%). african americans were much more likely than the whites to report that they consumed alcohol while in prison. although alcohol abuse was typically frowned upon by both groups, the african americans felt far more culturally free to consume alcohol. "i'm not in the industry, so i can take a drink," explained one african american convict in a general discussion on the impact of prison on her life. "no one made us stop drinking when we was locked up. i like to drink when i get out, just not to get drunk." african americans' attitudes toward alcohol use and the criminal justice system did not change after they were released from prison. indeed, the african american community seemed to have a fairly strong social context for the consumption of alcohol, primarily because of the availability of alcohol in their neighborhoods and the willingness of their neighbors to provide their own beverages. interestingly, while both groups consumed alcohol in common contexts such as social gatherings or while at work, the role of alcohol at other times of the day often seemed to differ. for example, the african americans more frequently reported consuming alcohol before heading to bed, while the whites more often drank alcohol at midafternoon or during the evening. whites were also more likely than african americans to report drinking while driving or around children. in addition to alcohol consumption, both groups reported engaging in a wide range of activities in their leisure time, including music, reading, sports, and other pastimes. convict recreation trust, a charitable organization that provides recreational activities and sports programs to inmates in british jails, found in a survey that 39 percent of the white prisoners in england drink alcohol, compared to only 28 percent of the african americans. these statistics serve to illustrate how the social contexts associated with the consumption of alcohol are pervasive, and are clearly reflected in the social interactions of both groups. further analysis of the whites' and african americans' experience in prison illustrates their differing social contexts for alcohol and leisure time activities. the urban nature of imprisonment as well as the high levels of unemployment and work-related violence among the whites provide both an explanation and a response for their above-average consumption of alcohol in prison. in contrast, a greater range of opportunities for social contact in the african american environment, as well as the social and economic support for leisure time activity when released from prison, are more likely to be associated with the above-average consumption of alcohol by african americans while in prison. 5ec8ef588b
