In a speech last year, industry veteran John Knoll shared his thoughts on the future of Photoshop, and where it was heading. His talk saw him share his opinion that the past 20 years of Photoshop, when it came to the filtering and effects that people used to apply, have since been superseded by Instagram filters, like the Lightroom Instagram filter . But Knoll also saw a key difference between Instagram and older filters; that social media users these days want to share their work in the social spaces where they are, and not on other social spaces. This means that the filter tools that we see in notifications get more and more specialised. “The horizon at which our tools are driving toward is the space saying: “Well, let’s redefine how people use photos. Maybe we should turn a camera and make it a light room on the go, maybe we should turn it into a device or an interactive web gallery.” Enter Adobe AI filters, which work to predict which filters to apply to your image. This is done by taking data from the images you shoot, and then feeding it into a neural network that learns based on how you use the app. We currently have a vast range of tools along the classic Photo Editing workflow that help us transform a digital picture into something beautiful. But what we don’t have yet is something that can analyse a picture we already took, and learn to fill in the content we missed in the first place. Luckily, the future is here. Adobe created the tool called Photoshop Deep Learning Filters, and it’s the brainchild of Medard de Freitas, who specializes in applying Artificial Intelligence to all things digital, digital content creation, visual content creation, and more.
