I have a global constant call count and a global function call() They both contain the same name and different type, const string & and void. class Test_Class { private: static string count; static void call(); } This is my code snippet. When I write Test_Class::count = "Count"; Test_Class::call(); //This works fine count = "Call"; call(); // this gives ambiguous call, when I create a default constructor for Test_Class Why does this error happen? How to solve this problem? If I write like below then it gives me an error for unnamed namespaces. I can do something like this by putting everything in the class, but I think this is not preferred. string Test_Class::count = "Count"; void Test_Class::call() { coutQ: jQuery ajax POST data issue in Safari If I log the POST data in the jQuery ajax call, the output I get in Safari is different from what I get in other browsers. I'm using the following ajax function which is responsible for POSTing a message to the server: var xhr = new XMLHttpRequest(); xhr
