As far as the UI of Photoshop is concerned, there isn't much to talk about since it hasn't changed much at all from the last version. It's a bit more friendly to use, with the help of icons that make it clear what the functions are. You'll notice that some things have been moved into Smart Objects, like the ability to select multiple areas by pressing Shift+click. Some of the panels have moved around a bit, like the adjustment settings which have moved to the left side. The full suite of icons are still there, like the grids for aligning and rotating, and all but the most unusual of adjustments, like the Liquify tool, can be found in the Adjustments panel. There are also a number of tools which are missing when compared to the previous version, such as cloning, trapping, and the lens correction module that has been replaced with Lensbaby. ABOVE: The (Common) Layers panel is the same. BELOW: This is the same area, but with the Layers panel removed. Notice that dynamic filters and adjustments are only available on the right. The Lensbaby lens correction tool lives on in Photoshop CC 2020, but there are no further plans to make it available to the version of Photoshop you can download for free. It lives on in Photoshop CC 2020 as a separate tool via the More menu. So, what is new? Well, for starters, some of the differences are kind of irrelevant to the vast majority of users and some are definitely aimed at pro creators using Photoshop with both the Corel and Adobe platforms. For example, Motion Blur can now be applied to video. You'll find more details in the next section, but the short version is, yes, you can now apply motion blur to a video file. (This was one of the features asked for in the Adobe forum.)
