A stable, p-type, ZnO layer with tunable properties was synthesized by anodization on a Si wafer in an aqueous KOH solution. The ZnO layer was characterized by atomic force microscopy, X-ray diffraction, and photoluminescence spectroscopy. The ZnO layer was used as an effective p-type layer in a ZnO/p-Si heterostructure to form a Schottky diode, and the photodetection properties of the p-ZnO/p-Si heterostructure were examined under illumination by a UV lamp. The p-ZnO/p-Si heterostructure shows a good rectification characteristic and a considerable photocurrent under UV light illumination. The measured responsivity and detectivity are 3.1 A W-1 and 8.4 × 1012 Jones, respectively. The ZnO layer was found to have an excellent thermal stability and maintain its chemical and optical properties after annealing at high temperatures (400-600 °C). These results demonstrate that the ZnO layer formed by the anodization method is stable and can be used as a precursor layer to fabricate p
