As the story unfolds, it is revealed that Penny is a newly diagnosed schizophrenic who feels she is an alien, and her "sister", Drue, is also suffering with this affliction. On being hired, the new housekeeper is chaperoned to the living quarters by her employer, who wants to make sure that she is of age. Penny, who has visions of herself flying, is shocked to discover that this was why she was hired. When she is told that she must marry her employer's nephew, Arthur, she reacts by running away. She is eventually forced to give up the security of her home and her freedom. Film Review: The Girl Who Wanted to Fly is a psychological thriller revolving around the slow descent of a young woman's sanity after she is raped by her cousin, and the subsequent kidnapping of her sister. It's so successful in the setting and execution that it's easy to forget that this is a 1930's film. The basic idea is very sound: a woman who is slowly losing her grip on reality, and is forced into a situation where her worst fear is realized. In its execution, however, the movie fails. The underlying theme - that something as sinister as
