Thanks for helping the community. I can't wait to see more of your latest work. Adam, if you are ever in the USA, let me know. I would love to buy you dinner or drinks just to thank you for your hard work. It is a fact, developers have always believed, that what they have designed is perfect. However, there is always room for improvement. Adobe is dedicated to making it easier for fellow developers to contribute their improvements. We announced a new, open source, framework about a year ago for this purpose, called Google's Khronos OpenCL. Our Photoshop support for OpenCL, which is still in beta, is helping to enable dozens of thousands of graphical artists and developers to innovate faster than ever. In addition, Photoshop's up-to-the-minute performance improvements and unprecented feature set, means there are always new features to discover and improve on. These improvements streamline Photoshop with new technologies, such as Direct2D, which accelerates modern GPU. Direct2D also increases efficiency and speed for drawing and writing. That's not the only advantage to the new version. Usability is a constant focus for us, and each release incorporates new features and enhancements to do just that. We now have many new customization features, which allow you to create your own preset settings for your own workflow, and to save as presets so that you can switch between them quickly. For example with the Galton-Raybould Effect, you can now set the intensity of the mode, the color of the mode, and the saturation of the image within the adjustment dialog. Also, you can now create patterns with any number of colors and manipulate the shape of the pattern, and it keeps the functions and behavior while creating the new pattern the same as the old.
